

ADDITIONAL LICENSING

What is additional business licensing and what does it do ?

In addition to state and local government business licensing, there are a host of other licenses that may or may not be required based on the profession and or state and local regulations.

How does additional licensing help build business credibility?

Additional licensing protects not only the consumer by ensuring that the business they are dealing with has met all of the requirements for their location and industry, but it also sends a signal to the market that they are up to date with their licensing and that they take pride in their chosen field. Trust & transparency are exponentially increased when a business shares their additional licensing to a prospect or consumer and everyone wins..

Examples of some of the most common additional business and occupational licenses

Many states require business owners in specific fields to obtain a specific kind of license in order to operate legally. Professionals and business owners often need this operational license to start their own businesses and to keep them running over the years.

In general, however, a business or professional might need an occupational or professional state license if you're in one of the following professions:

- Accountants
- Electricians
- Plumbers
- Contractors
- Mechanics
- Collection agents
- Physicians
- Appraisers
- Real estate brokers
- Private auctioneers
- Repossessors
- insurance agents
- Cosmetologists
- Barbers
- Private security guards
- Private investigators
